Superintendent Butcher yesterday received a letter from Prof. Parker, Superintendent of the Public Schools of Boston, in answer to an invitation to be present at the Convention of Educators in this city the last of the month. Superintendent Parker is probably the foremost living American educator. He was formerly the head of the Quincy schools, which became famous in connection with the revolution in educational methods, and the introduction of rational systems of imparting instruction. His letter is quite interesting here. It is as follows:

He was standing on the foundations of a new house that was being built for him on that part of the Cruger farm purchased by him, and talking to the missons, when he suddenly dropped dead. The cause of his death was supposed to be paralysis of the heart. He was removed to his home on his farm, in the Short Creek district. He was a man sixty-eight years old, and farmed in this country from boyhood, meeting with success and prosperity. He leaves a wife and six children.

our first. The latest case occurred last even-ing about six o'clock, and the story reads like go down to New Oricans and get a job with the circus. Wise had been previously connected with. He succeeded in painting sopleasant a picture that the boy yesterday norning packed up a valle, stole $35 in currency and $5 in sliver, and joined Wise for the trip. They expressed the valles to Wheeling, and last evening went to the C. & P. depot to take the train, but Stills backed out, and at hat started up the railroad for home. Wise followed, coaxing him not to be scared out, but the boy would not be persuaded. When they were up about the paper mill, Stills, who was in front, was struck by Wise on the head and knocked down. He could not see what Wise had in his hand, but it looked white, and the supposition is, it was a stone wrapped in a handkerchief. After he was down, Wise tried to take the money, but he retained sufficient consciousness to struggle, and then Wise hit him several more licks in the head, and he knew no more until he was roused by being dragged by the heels over the ground to the river. Wise dragged him out into the water the length of a skiff and tried to drown out what life still remained, but the cold water revived him and he began the struggle again, and succeeded in getting back to the shore, when he started up the beach on a run, Wise did not follow him far, and he was so badly shaken up, that he did not see which way Wise went, but thought it was lack down the railroad. Stills went up as far as 'Darddy' Wells' boat near the bridge, and there he found Ed. Norris, a colored unan, who took him in charge and informed the police. Dr. G. A. Shane was called and he examined and dressed the boy's wounds. He found six ugly cuts on his head, from an inch and a half long, and all to the bone, and one on the side of the forchead; also a large well or knot across the forchead; also a large well or knot across the forchead; also a large well or knot across the forchead; also a large well or knot across the forchead; the skin scratched off his face on both sides where he had been dragged, and several ba the bone, and one on the side of the forchead; also a large well or knot across the forchead; the skin scratched off his face on both sides where he had been dragged, and several bad marks on the legs and lower part of the body, evidently made by kicks. He was also soaking wet, and was about as badly used up piece of humanity as could be found. The forty dollars and the express receipt for the valies were both gone. He remained all night at the Mayor's office, and this morning although he objected to being talked to, his eyes were bright, and he did not look like had had such a terrible experience. Dr. Slame could find no fracture of the skull, and thinks there is no danger to be apprehended in that quarter. The boy says he stole the money, but that Wise coaxed him into it. Wise is of course gone, and he probably left by way of Wheeling, so that he could get Stills' valles there. The police are after him, and if he is caught we may have another representative in the Columbus penitentiary from Jefferson county. There is no doubt but that Wise cannot kill Stills, as he is only a boy, and not a big one, and he could have been robbed without such elaborate proceedings as were used by the attacking unity.
